

United States' idea of Security

In the last session of Security Council, presided by José María Silva and Mariana Cuberos, the debate kept moving around how to ensure the security in failed States and how a plan against terrorism could be made. United States, a country that, in the paper, should be protagonist, reinforced what seemed to be an antique idea of what they considered security: Military defense.

According to one of our reporters, Natalia Machado, "The United States is going to use the military forces in any cases (...)" which we considered a rushed and extremist decision. The use of military forces is understandable as a last resource in cases where other options were made and taken into account, but is despicable in any other case, as it only promotes hate, terrorism and violence. It is clear that the world's situation is a very delicate one, and the time that the countries have to think in solutions is limited, but still, rushing into such a dangerous measure is problematic. There is no doubt that United States nowadays defends a conservative position, mostly promoted by the president Donald Trump, and it is understandable that the idea of military reinforcement is considered, nonetheless, it is time to think in different measures to prevent terrorism and assure the security of the world, mostly against the terrorist attacks. Maybe is important that countries around the globe make United States, and every other country that has this ideal, consider other ways to achieve such goals, as the general rejection to the State that practices terrorism, with the help of several nations, or the reinforcement of education in zones where the harm has been normalized.

Julián Ramírez Botero